Abstract
Feel like a real spy as you read the true stories of some of the best secret agents for the allied forces during World War II. Merlin Minshall leads a mission to delay ships from delivering war supplies to Germany. When the mission fails, he escapes on a speedboat. Josephine Baker is an entertainer who uses her fame to carry top secret information without being suspected. Ian Fleming helps start a group of secret agents which later inspired him to create the character, James Bond. Virginia Hall helped the French Resistance get supplies and training. Morris Berg was an American baseball player who was recruited to find out if the Germans had discovered how to make an atom bomb. While each of these spies played a different role in the war, each was important in helping the Allies succeed and end the war.

World War II made heroes out of countless soldiers, scientists, officials, and even cooks, and the World War II timeline is dotted with remarkable and heroic individuals. Whether fighting the Nazis on the European front or making a difference against the Japanese in the Pacific, these real-life heroes helped lead the Allies to victory and helped make the world what it is today. Their sacrifices for their fellow fighters and even strangers they’d never meet were truly heroic. This list features many World War II soldiers, pilots, and fighters who you should know something about. Some were Some secrets are meant to stay hidden World War I. The BBC had a feature article today which I found interesting and thought I’d share. It was a profile on Noor Inayat Khan, who served as a British spy in France against the Nazis during World War II. Eventually she was captured, (and some sources say tortured, although it is unconfirmed), and executed in Dachau... Agent Blanche is the last surviving female British spy during the Second World War. There were other spies and secret agents who were not quite as visible as Josephine Baker, a spy hiding in plain sight. There were others who were in the French Resistance, a group of women and men who worked in secret to fight the Nazis after Germany invaded France in June 1940.* There was a particularly notorious spy who caught the attention of the Nazis. She was described as “one of the most dangerous Allied agents in France.” She was also known as the Limping Lady. Just who was this woman? You’ll learn the answer to that question and learn many more interesting facts about unusual spies a... Christine Granville was known for a bunch of exploits in World War II, but her ballsiest was a rescue mission. She walked into a Gestapo-controlled prison in France and secured the release of three other spies scheduled for execution. At the time, her face was on wanted posters spread across the country. British agents would be approached by Chilvers during their mission and she tried and get secrets out of them. Any who divulged information were dropped from the program. 6. Virginia Hall led a resistance group despite having only one foot. Wikimedia Commons. Virginia Hall lost her foot prior to World War II, an injury that ended her hopes for a career in the foreign service. So, instead she became a spy.
