Once the rules are created, teachers help students practice the rules. And when rules are broken, teachers respond with nonpunitive logical consequences. Of these three components—creating the rules, practicing the rules, and responding to rule breaking—the most often overlooked in the busy life of the classroom is practicing the rules. If we want children to get better at piano, what do we tell them? PRACTICE! If we want them to get better at reading or math or spelling, what do we tell them? PRACTICE! But if we want them to get better at developing self-control and responsibility, then what

There's some good stuff here it just gets lost in the text which verges on the edge of boring most of the time. I will keep and come back to from time to time and I imagine this rating ultimately will rise. flag Like · see review. Best practices in curriculum and leadership within a constructivist context were scrutinised, with cognitive performances relative to delivery mode compared. Guiding this study were the community of inquiry (CoI) framework and two questions: Did student learning vary between groups completing the same course? and Did students' cognitive learning capacity for making meaning change from one constructivist environment to the next? When I mention above that this change should be radical, but gentle, I refer readers to a book by Zemelman, Daniels, and Hyde (2012), now in its fourth edition, that deservedly made the rounds in many college classes and professional development sessions, Best Practice: Bringing Standards to Life in America's Classrooms.
