Chin Chiang has always wanted to participate in the New Year's dragon's dance. But now that he's old enough to dance with his grandfather, he's nervous. "If the dance was clumsy," one of the other dancers told him, "the Great Dragon would be angry. Then he might toss the fruit from the trees and flood the valley."

During the final rehearsal with his grandfather, Chin Chiang runs away and takes refuge on the roof of the public library. There he meets Pu Yee, an old woman who used to do the dragon dance. They practise on the rooftop and, although he plans to make Pu Yee take his place in the dance, Chin Chiang gains confidence and is able to execute the dance with grace.

The watercolour illustrations are intricate and vibrant. They capture the movement and magic of the Chinese New Year, with textured layers of ribbon, lanterns, fireworks and, of course, the dragon costume, whose head is "splendid and fierce" and whose striped tail is made of coloured silk. In one scene, Chin Chiang and Pu Yee dance on the pebbled rooftop, a cityscape behind them and fuzzy sunlit clouds in the distance.

The language is poetic and reads like a fable: "High in the sky flags of fire and falling moons burst into light. They sizzled and sparkled, rocketed straight up and whistled to the ground." The story has a happy ending, with both Chin Chiang and Pu Yee dancing the dragon's dance. Grandfather invites Pu Yee home for dinner, and they toast "to a prosperous Year of the Dragon."
Chin Chiang has long dreamed of dancing the dragon's dance, but when the first day of the Year of the Dragon arrives and he is to dance with his grandfather, he is sure he will shame his family and bring bad luck to everyone. And that means just what you think it means: the narrative has moved past the time frame of Feast, and the two streams have once again rejoined each other. Her chin was pointed and her nose flat, and she had a mole on one cheek with four dark hairs growing from it.
