
Who's Having This Baby? showcases women's stories about their own birthing experiences and urges women to become more active decision makers in their pregnancy and birthing processes. The book originated in The Birthing Project, an archive of women's stories of their birthing experiences held at Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The chapter authors explore these and other birthing narratives from five different perspectives: history, literature, communication, anthropology, and nursing/midwifery. Together, the chapters weave a rich tapestry of analytical experiences that transcend academic boundaries to build a collective argument about the necessity for women to feel that they are partners with others (e.g., doctors, midwives) in control of their own experience giving birth.

Each chapter draws the reader into the intimate details of birthing as these are lived out in various cultural, racial, class, geographic, and urban-rural contexts. The result is an insightful inquiry into the personal, institutional, and cultural narrative...
