Abstract
This project will outline steps in counseling newly married couples to develop biblical, physical, emotional, social, and spiritual unity within marriage. A review of currently available marital and pre-marital counseling suggests the focus centers on intimacy, communication issues, and being happy together versus truly becoming one flesh. This ministry tool will enable pastors to counsel and prepare couples effectively for marriage with the richness God designed for marriage and to fortify them against marital temptation and marital fatigue. Based on a review of available resources and data collected from a control group comprised of sixty individuals, an implementable discipleship program will be developed to aid pastors in counseling new couples towards absolute oneness. Biblical oneness is most effectively forged within marriage when couples understand and are committed to God's vision for the union and are together growing in the knowledge and grace of their Lord and Savior Jesus Christ through prioritizing the ministry of prayer and the Word in their lives.

as a unit. A man is called to leave his parents—to step out of their home and provision—and become one flesh with his wife. As husband and wife work together in the stuff of life, they become united, and may even start to look like each other. As "one flesh," a married couple coordinates their efforts to ensure they get the work done—both as individuals and as a team. As any couple surrounded by kids, church, work, and friends knows, husbands and wives cannot fulfill their God-given duties unless they work together. Beyond practical and spiritual matters, we need to realize that our flesh belongs to our spouse (1 Corinthians 7:4), and the way we treat our body needs to reflect the respect we have for our spouse. Every couple that is joined in marriage becomes one flesh under this decree of the creator. A marriage is not made by a religious minister or by the law of the land. It is not even made by the vows that the groom and bride make to each other.
